Wound healing, or repair, is a complex process that is complete within a few days of injury. It involves an orderly progression of events that, once initiated, are characterised by many changes in cellular biology. In its final stages, wound repair gives rise to a scar. This process can go awry, resulting in failure of repair (FFR) that may ultimately lead to chronicity. We have developed a model for FFR. The model has two components: 1) a disruption of the normal repair sequence, typified by failure of epithelialisation, and 2) a further loss of healing capacity, typified by scar contracture. The mechanisms of both are considered, as is the capacity of various agents to prevent FFR. Of the numerous agents investigated, mostly antimicrobials, many are safe and have applications in humans. However, their lack of long-term safety may limit their clinical use. On the other hand, agents that interfere with important molecular and cellular events in wound healing may have the potential for use in the clinic. New therapeutic approaches to FFR are now being developed. The model provides the basis for the screening of such agents.4 Tips For Making The Most Of Disney PhotoPass 4 Tips For Making The Most Of Disney PhotoPass As we celebrate the 25th anniversary of the launch of Disney PhotoPass, we still can't believe that it's almost as old as we are! 25 years ago, we changed the way families took vacation photos by introducing Mickey Mouse and a brand new character to go with him, and we've never looked back.
